“ Laura's passing saddens not only the people involved directly in her life, but her absence now leaves a hole in the lives of those she never even met.

Laura spent so much of her time lifting the spirits of many whom others look to for comfort. Laura handed down her happiness, those others payed it forward, and she made everyone better for it, without ever using those helping opportunities as leverage to complain about whatever sadness in her life.

Even in sickness when asked about her health, Laura would give you the facts without a hint of seeking her own sympathy. For the shortest person I've ever know, Laura stood taller than anyone. She forgot never the names of her friends nor even brief incidental acquaintances. She made you more important in her life than you even thought of yourself in yours.

*I don't think I ever saw Laura not smiling.
And that won't change, even as she smiles more now, reunited with love she gave without sacrifice of happiness, nor dependent on acceptance or rejection . . .
Little Laurie again in her glory, now likewise her cats.*
